JUMBLED PRAGRAPH 7

(A) To elaborate briefly on these characteristics and dimensions that the authority is talking about - NRMs are general tests intended to be used to classify students by percentile for measuring either aptitude or proficiency for admission into or placement within a programme.

(B) Contrastingly, the CRM, such as a locally produced achievement test, measures absolute performance that is compared only with the learning objective, hence a perfect score is theoretically obtainable by all students who have a mastery of the pre-specified material, or conversely, all students may fail the test.

(C) In most of these books, the authors classify a measurement strategy as either norm- referenced (NRM) or criterion referenced (CRM).

(D) Another author points out how the type of interpretation that an NRM offers is the relative performance of the students compared with that of all the others resulting in, ideally, a bell curve distribution.

(E) Numerous books on constructing and using language tests have been written by various authors.

(F) CRMs, on the other hand, are more specific, achievement or diagnostic tests intended to be used for motivating students by measuring to what percent they have achieved mastery of the taught or learned material.

(G) One of the authors clearly delineates the differences of these two types by focusing on the categories of "test characteristics" and "logistical dimensions".

A) Ironically, the same parents who are considered to be ignorant are thought to be very enlightened in choosing private schools over state-run ones.

B) This is all the more reason why we should include them during the planning and implementation of the system.

C) This is apparent at every stage from policymaking to implementation as critical decisions are made without the participation of the stakeholders, an attitude that can only be described as either arrogance or indifference.

D) In reality, every parent decides which school is a good one, based on his/her own set of values, perceptions and aspirations.

E) The root cause of most of the ills that plague our education system is the enormous distance that separates the power centres within the system and the schools where the action takes place.

F) It is often said in defense of such an approach that poor parents are too ignorant to be the partners in a meaningful dialogue.

(A) While the reference point for the former is the state, for the latter it's society.

(B) India's strategic community' comprises two distinct circles with little overlap.

(C) Consequently ,mainstream strategists have an external orientation to their discourse, concentrating on high politics; the latter is more internal oriented.

(D) Their prescriptions too are understandably poles apart and thus, the state, to which both their commentary is directed, has to play balancer, and ends up being at the receiving end of criticism from both sides.

(E) Out of the two, one can be termed the 'mainstream' and the other 'alternate'

(F) To further elaborate on the external and internal concept- while one is enamoured of India's rise and place in the global order, the other is more sensitive to its vulnerabilities and inadequacies
